Explores how feminist theory can engage disembodiment as a real and historically grounded praxis, offering a feminist realist framework that integrates continental theory, posthumanist thought, non-philosophy, and disembodying technologies.

The book explores how disembodiment is relevant and productive for feminist theory. Panayotov asks how we can face disembodiment literally, as a real praxis rather than a literary trope, by colliding feminism, non-philosophy, new realisms, and posthumanities to argue for literal disembodiment in the contemporary posthuman condition.
