Culturally curious, well-read audiences drawn to Korea through K-pop, K-dramas, and Squid Game, skewing younger but reaching across generations, alongside students and general readers of history, linguistics, and philosophy

Post-Liberal Futures: Epistemic Justice, Ontological Freedom and the Black Archive advances a critique of liberalism's limits in securing recognition and non-domination, positioning the Black Archive as a conceptual and institutional resource for reimagining democracy through alternative epistemologies and relational ontologies.

Key selling points

- Offers a rigorous philosophical critique of liberalism, demonstrating its structural limits in securing epistemic justice, recognition and non-domination in postcolonial contexts.
- Introduces the Black Archive as a novel conceptual and institutional framework for rethinking knowledge production, pedagogy and democratic life.
- Draws on African intellectual traditions, including William Wellington Gqoba and S. E. K. Mqhayi, to develop alternative epistemologies and relational ontologies.
- Speaks directly to contemporary debates in higher education, decolonial theory and political thought, offering a programmatic vision for post-liberal futures

About the Author(s) / Editor(s)

Siseko H. Kumalo is a political theorist and Associate Professor at the Ali Mazrui Centre for Higher Education Studies at the University of Johannesburg, whose work advances African philosophy, decolonial theory, and higher education transformation. His scholarship centres the Black Archive as a living epistemic resource to reimagine knowledge, pedagogy, and democratic life beyond liberal paradigms.
