Argues that capitalism expropriates the fundamental human capacity for self-creation and develops a philosophical framework, drawing on Spinoza and Judith Butler, for reclaiming our capacity to constitute ourselves and produce a just life.

By aiming to disentangle our being from economic value, the book will articulate the reflection along three theoretical junctions: (1) The economical original sin, (2). The ethico-political causa sui; (3) Political immanent causality: on Common Being.

Readership

The book could be described as a concise philosophical-activist work that seeks to introduce new images of thought, capable of laying the foundations for alternative forms of epistemology and praxis. Thus, its readership could range from committed intellectuals (ethics, politics, critical theory) to students, professors, thinkers, and artists.

The book will appeal to continental philosophers, Marxist thinkers, critical thought scholars, students of philosophy, critical theory and political movements, activists, and artists.

More specifically, it will be of interest to academic associations that are interested in continental philosophy and post-Marxian thought.
