Argues that our lived experiences of light, the body, and mortality fundamentally shape how we understand vision, space, time, and knowledge, offering a philosophically grounded realism that goes beyond scientific explanation.

Rather than treating space, time, and perception as purely physical phenomena, this book shows how they emerge from our embodied, mortal condition. It explores the existential role of light and death in shaping experience, revealing the hidden foundations of seemingly objective knowledge, both empirical and mathematical.

Key selling points

- Radical rethinking of space, time, and perception: Challenges dominant philosophical and scientific assumptions by showing the indispensable role of ordinary experience (while engaging central debates in the philosophy of perception, time, mathematics, and physics).
- Novel theory of vision: Argues that our relation to the seen parallels our relation to the body, uncovering hidden structures of experience.
- Existential depth with analytic rigor: Examines light and death not as physical phenomena but as constitutive dimensions of human experience, integrating phenomenological, existential, and analytic traditions in a unified account of vision and reality.
- Reframing the realism/antirealism debate: Proposes an original realist position that acknowledges the constitutive role of lived human experience.
